This website is one of the best Audiology websites I've had the pleasure of surfing. Those of you who have read my columns for a while will be used to the sometimes extravagant superlatives that I dish out when excited, but the above statement is one want? My first good impression of this site was the accessibility note on the front page giving advice on how to better access the pages if one were visually impaired or using a less than adequate monitor. All the pictures, and buttons on this site had written pop-up explanations too. Many websites cut out huge swathes of their potential audience by ignoring these issues. As well as affecting their hit rate, it also demonstrates a wilful 'couldn't care less' attitude to those less fortunate. So it was nice to visit a site that took this on board. After this first good impression it was uphill all the way.

This website is non-commercial and runs as an internet resource for students and professionals in Audiology and associated fields. Amongst the many resources that it hosts are links to the latest Audiology news, and educational resources, as well as information on various events, meetings, organisations, and institutions, along with a link to an interactive Audiology forum. This forum takes the form of an online message board where individuals can ask and answer questions, and post comments and observations on both Audiology practice and research related matters. One of the other engaging aspects of this website was the link to the page containing fun stuff! There you encounter 11 jigsaw puzzles to test and tease your mental agility. Just the thing to set your brain right after surfing for a while.

The author of this website is a Dr Ali Mohiuddin. He, and all the other contributors have put together an excellent and really useful audiological resource and deserve our praise. Make sure you bookmark this site.

one I am prepared to stick by, through thick and thin! Easy navigation, good layout, simple English, in-depth content, a host of good links, and fun too. What more could
